

Dr Ian WYLIE

Ian Wylie is a graduate of Oxford University where he holds an MA in philosophy and a DPhil in English. He worked in the NHS in inner London and in Oxford, specializing in primary care development, hospital modernization and health service redevelopment and restructuring. After a spell in local government, he joined the King's Fund, the independent health development foundation, as Director of Corporate Affairs. He has been the Chief Executive of the British Dental Association, the trade union and professional body for UK dentists; and the TreeHouse Trust, which campaigns for effective treatment for autistic young people. In 2009-10 he worked for the Hong Kong Hospital Authority to develop the first clinical service plans for the SAR, before returning to the UK in September 2010 as Chief Executive of the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists. He is the co-author of a book on Patient Power and has written and edited a number of reports and publications for the Department of Health in England. A Fellow of the Royal Society of Medicine, he is also a non-executive director of the women's research charity, Wellbeing for Women.
