

Doris Young is Professor and Chair of General Practice and Associate Dean Academic, Faculty of Medicine, Dentistry and Health Sciences, University of Melbourne.

Doris has been involved extensively in educating and training medical students, registrars, general practitioners and other health professionals in adolescent medicine, general practice and primary care research for over 25 years. Nationally, she was involved in the establishment, support and evaluation of the Divisions of General Practice movement and chaired the Royal Australian College of General Practitioners National Standing Committee on Research for three years. She is currently a member of the National Health and Medical Research Council Academy and Health Care Committee. She has been the External Examiner for the Hong Kong College of Family Physicians Exit Examination since 2007.

Doris' current research focuses on trialling innovative models of care in the primary care setting to improve health outcomes for people with chronic diseases in disadvantaged communities. She leads the chronic disease and equity research group within the Medical School's General Practice and Primary Health Care Academic Centre and continues to work as a part time General Practitioner in a community health centre serving a multicultural, diverse and disadvantaged community.
